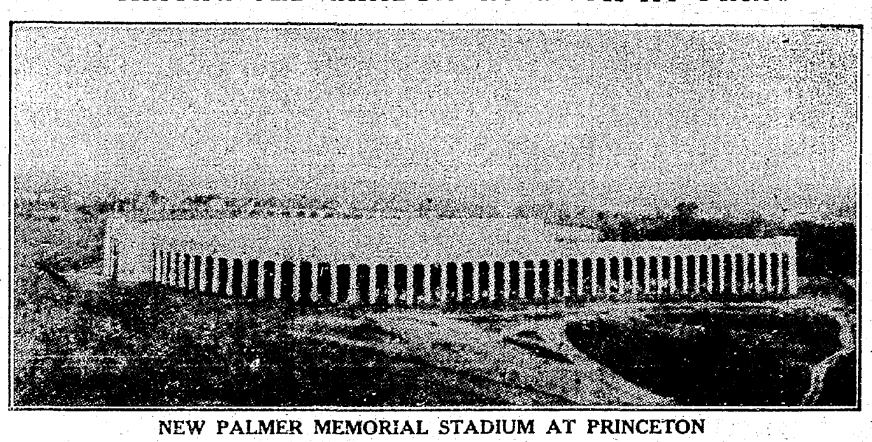
PALMER MEMORIAL STADIUM, MOST RECENT OF UNIVERSITY STRUCTURES, CREATES INTEREST AMONG OLD GRADUATES BACK AT PRINCETON



NEW PALMER MEMORIAL STADIUM AT PRINCETON

PRINCETON, June 12.—Palmer Memorial Stadium, which seats 41,000 persons, and in which Euripides' "Iphigenia in Tauris" and "The Trojan Women" were given most successfully Friday and yesterday by the Granville Barker Company, is one of the most fascinating points of interest for Princeton University graduates and their friends during commencement week here. Princeton has many beautiful buildings, with which the stadium will never be compared, but for those interested in the athletic side of university life the new stadium is the center of interest.

The structure was presented to the university by Edgar Palmer, 1903, for the use of the Athletic Association, and was given in memory of the donor's father, the late Stephen S. Palmer, of the Board of Trustees. The stadium cost approximately $500,000.

It is situated south of Prospect Avenue, near the Cottage and Cap and Gown Club houses. It has approaches from Washington Road and the Broadmead section, and from the road along the northern side of Lake Carnegie. For pedestrians there is an attractive approach from Prospect Avenue, between the Cap and Gown and the Cottage Clubs. Its site has many advantages, both on account of the lay of the land and because it is adjacent to University Field. It is also of easy access from the university as a whole, from the railroad terminals and from the roads leading into Princeton.

The type of structure is that of the Harvard Stadium, the shape being that of the letter "U," with the open end toward Lake Carnegie to the south, affording a fine view of the rolling country beyond the lake. The stadium is constructed entirely of reinforced concrete and contains 40 rows of seats, with a wide promenade extending around the entire top.

Princeton's collegiate Gothic architecture has been followed as far as possible in its construction. The main entrance on the north consists of two rugged towers, connected by a sweeping arch. The exterior appearance throughout the entire length of the structure on each side of the main entrance presents alternating arches and supporting columns.

There are 27 entrances to the seats, the playing field being on a lower level than the upper slope to the north. The plans for the stadium were drawn by H. J. Hardenburgh, New York, the architect of Palmer Physical Laboratory, the Plaza, Martinique, Waldorf-Astoria Hotels, in New York, and the New Willard in Washington. It was built by the Fuller Construction Company of New York.

Mr. Palmer, who presented the Stadium, was graduated from the university in 1903 with the degree of bachelor of science, after which he entered the School of Electrical Engineering, receiving the degree of E. E. in 1905. He is now president of the New Jersey Zinc Company, in which office he succeeded his father, in whose memory the Stadium was given, and who presented to Princeton the great Palmer Physical Laboratory, a gift representing more than half a million dollars. This building is recognized as the best physical laboratory yet constructed.

The income from the Stadium is of great importance to the Athletic Association for the suport of athletics generally. It is confidently expected that after interest charges have been paid to the university the Stadium will be a source of revenue which will provide for the much needed enlargement of Princeton's athletic equipment.
